Erin Washington

A [person] can't just sit around, 2014

Lawn chair, helium-filled balloons, fishing wire, and stakes

Courtesy of the artist

Taking inspiration from the now infamous story of "Lawn Chair Larry," artist Erin Washington recreates in part Larry Walter's 1982 experiment when he took flight in a lawn chair outfitted with helium balloons. Washington's humorous gesture is nod to the many ways that humans have attempted to overcome their terrestrial design.

Rachel Foster

Outposts, Satellites, and Orphan Planets, 2012

Silkscreen and offset prints

An artist whose work explores the transmission of knowledge and its coding, Foster presents this library of prints as a open-ended gesture to visitors. Each print is given away freely, yet a story comes attached. In collecting the prints, each visitor also collects these stories, and is left to weave together their meaning as they see fit.

Nicholas Sagan

Constant Visitations, 2014-15

Video projection (color, sound) and mylar

8 minutes (looped)

Over the past couple years, Sagan has been recording video of the Moon, returning to the subject time and again. This constant act of looking up at the Moon is then projected onto mylar, causing the light and image to refract as it bounces from mirrored panel to panel.

New Catalogue

Questions For A New Golden Record, 2015

Ink on newsprint

Courtesy of the artists

Inspired by Carl Sagan's plans for the Golden Record - which was eventually attached to the Voyager spacecraft - New Catalogue set out to crowd-source new information and ideas as to what is culturally meaningful or definitive today. Collaborative duo Luke Batten and Jonathan Sadler present their findings in a newspaper takeaway.
